Baby Doe Tabor, The Silver Queen, was born in 1855, in Oshkosh, Wisconsin, christened Elizabeth McCourt. She became the belle of Oshkosh with bright blue eyes, a constant smile, reddish gold hair and a "gift of gab." Following her marriage to Harvey Doe in 1877, she moved to Central City, Colorado, where the miners named her "Baby Doe." Following a brief period of happiness, her marriage failed. With the help and at the urging of a friend, she moved to Leadville, Colorado, where she met and fell in love with Lt. Govenor Horace Tabor, one of the richest and most prominent men in Colorado.

Tabor had started out as a modest storekeeper and from a prospecting partnership costing $64.00, he became a millionaire. Tabor invested his new wealth in mines, railroads, and real estate. In 1880 he bought the Matchless Mine which has become Colorado's most publicized mine. The Matchless Mine, founded in July of 1878, was named by its founders after Lorillard's popular chewing tobacco of that day.

Tabor was a married man when he met Baby Doe and his eventual divorce and love for Baby Doe caused much scandal. Baby Doe and Tabor were lavishly married in 1883. President Arthur, senators and congressmen attended the ceremony in Washington, D.C., but without their wives, who banned the Tabors from society.

Tabor's investments continued to grow and the Matchless Mine continued to prosper. The Tabors lived lavishly spending as much as $10,000 a day. Baby Doe was the most watched and talked about lady in society, though society never accepted her.

With the decline of silver in 1893, the Tabors fell from being among the righest in Colorado to poverty. Throughout their struggles their love continued. Tabor died in 1899 as postmaster of Denver. His last words to Baby Doe were "Hang on to the Matchless. It will make millions again." And Baby Doe did just that.

Penniless, Baby Doe moved back to Leadville in 1911. There she lived in the small tool cabin beside the shaft at the Matchless Mine. For years she lived in this cabin with only a wood burning stove for warmth, simple furnishings and little food. In 1935, Baby Doe's body was found frozen.
